

Many health facilities, health workers and patients are vulnerable during emergencies and in their aftermath. Many facilities also can't provide health care during crises.

The most expensive health facility is the one that fails and has to be repaired or rebuilt from scratch.

Including earthquake risk reduction measures in the design and construction of all new health facilities adds only 4% to the initial cost.

Safe health facilities are central to community emergency response, preparedness and resilience.

Crises threaten health facilities and interrupt public health services.

Disasters become a crisis if the disaster people are left without health care. Do not let

All types of emergencies threaten all health facilities.

Know your risk – act. Don't wait to be a victim to learn lessons that are already known.

Health workers are the first responders and the backbone of health care. Effective health care depends on

There are many facets to keeping health facilities safe in emergencies

Investing in health facilities and providing support for health facilities is one of the ways to ensure that health facilities are able to

Keeping health facilities safe from disasters is one sure way of reducing risks and saving lives.

There are many ways to keep health facilities safe in emergencies.