

6 December 2017 – Nutrition experts from Sudan’s Ministry of Health, and WHO, taught the participants about proper treatment of malnutrition in children between 6 and 59 months old, including about how to handle medical complications.

Nutrition experts from Sudan’s Ministry of Health, and WHO, taught the participants about proper treatment of malnutrition in children between 6 and 59 months old, including about how to handle medical complications.

The newly trained health workers will transfer their knowledge through a series of trainings to other health and nutrition workers in the health facilities of Darfur states, reaching out to malnourished children. By doing so, they will play a key role in reducing child mortality, especially among the complicated severely acute malnourished children of refugee and host communities in North, East, South, and Central Darfur states.
