

8 March 2021 – Compassion. Service. Empathy. These are a few qualities that resonate with doctors and health workers around the world, and in Somalia. In Mogadishu, armed with these qualities, Dr Naima Abdulkarim, Public Health Emergency Officer for the World Health Organization (WHO) in Somalia, is braving several challenges to follow her dream to serve her community.

"My mother worked as a nurse, and every time I saw her help children and women in our village, I used to say, 'Mom, I want to be like you," said Dr Naima, who joined WHO Somalia in May 2019.

Since then, she has been working closely with her team members, Government counterparts and other partners to prepare for and respond to health emergencies in the country.

Making a difference in the fight against COVID-190

Around a year ago, since the first case of coronavirus disease (COVID-19) was confirmed in Somalia, Dr Naima has been working at an isolation centre at the De Martino Hospital in Mogadishu. Her work includes providing support to the Federal Ministry of Health teams in conducting COVID-19 tests, contact tracing, capacity-building and case management. She is also supporting infection prevention and control efforts, collecting data and raising awareness of diseases like COVID-19 among the community.

Standing tail in the face of stereotypes

Dr Naima's professional life doesn't come without personal challenges. As she studied or discussed her ambitions, people were always trying to convince Dr Naima to change her mind about becoming a doctor.

"I have had to face a lot of questions and comments from people, like, 'A woman will never be able to survive such a terrible emergency,' or, 'This is a man's job,'" says Dr Naima, beaming as if to show she has proved them all wrong.

Her passion for humanitarian work and helping her community has kept her strong and dedicated over time.

"If there was one thing I could change about my country," says Dr Naima, "I would change people's belief that women cannot learn and cannot do everything, because we can. We can do anything we put our hearts into, no matter where we live."

The World Health Organization for Somalia applauds all Somali female health workers for their dedication and the role they play in improving community health across the country.  Mohamed is not his real name Wednesday 15th of May 2024 10:55:49 AM
